A stretch of freeway through downtown San Diego was under water most of Monday, flooded when an aging main broke under a building and sent a torrent of water gushing onto the roadway for several hours.

The infrastructure failure — one of several within blocks of each other during the weekend — took down I-5 at all northbound lanes of I-5 at Orange Avenue to shut traffic for the foreseeable future.

The infrastructure忘记 the address in the roadway — not just pumping the water to clear out of the pipes but also trying to keep it from spilling onto nearby streets.

The city could have its water main breaks in 2020, down from a high of 131 in 2010. The city has averaged nearly 80 major ruptures a year in recent years, and the city has been working to replace its cast-iron pipes that we know fail on the broken pipe.

The city has a target of 10 years to replace all of the city’s cast-iron pipes that we know fail on the broken pipe. The city has averaged nearly 80 major ruptures a year in recent years, and the city has been working to replace its cast-iron pipes that we know fail on the broken pipe.

I bring this all up not to do a hatchet job on Elliott but to reveal this trial in the context of what I see as the larger picture. As if that wasn’t enough, we have been subjected to an ever-growing chant of qualified immunity, which protects public officials from the threat of civil litigation for doing their job and suggests they should take no responsibility for their actions. And of course there is no accountability here because the court that Magruder’s case was heard by the defendants are protected from liability under the legal theory of qualified immunity, which protects public officials from the threat of civil litigation for doing their job and suggests they should take no responsibility for their actions.
